DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Across from the Post Office parking lot stands a two story frame dwelling, five bays long with central entrance and a crude portico over the entrance. It stands on a brick foundation and the walls are covered with asphalt siding made in imitation of stone. The four symmetrical windows on the first story and the five above have 6/6 sash and are shutterless. At each corner of the building are plain pilasters which rise to the deep fascia of the cornice. At both ends of the low pitch 'A' roof is a small brick chimney.

Its entrance is like many of the second half 19th century, with a door flanked by sidelights with panels beneath and a transom above.

The interior is divided into central stair hall with one room on each side. The stair hall and north room appear to possess some Federal period woodwork.

Whether this house was built at one time or in two stages cannot be assumed without farther investigation. The house was apparently moved from another part of Denton.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Nine Fifth Street is significant architecturally because of the early 19th century woodwork in at least half of the dwelling. Only the Taylor House and Seven Fourth Street are known to possess much of their original trim. It is also of interest as a building which has developed into a later style on its exterior while retaining much of its interior.
